

Tales from Huo Huan: The Origins of the Book Bugs

Have you ever wondered how the cracks in the Faultends were formed? Well, legend has it that millions of years ago, a giant book crashed onto the land now known as the Faultends. The giant book left a huge crater upon impact, and numerous cracks started to snake below the surface.

Scientists are not exactly sure how it happened, but early ancestral records stated that the first generation of Book Bugs emerged from within the pages of the book. As time went on, the Bugs found themselves travelling across Bugtopia in search of a place to call home. The book became an empty husk, left to face howling winds and the extreme heat of Huo Huan.

As years passed, its pages fell off and were scattered to the winds. The remaining pieces of the book seemed to have vanished into thin air. All that remained were the cracks in the ground.

So where exactly did this book come from? What kind of book was it? Well, that's one mystery the Bugs might never be able to solve. After all, even the universe has its own secrets to keep.

Oh, but you want to know so badly, don't you? Here's a hint: The next time you visit the library, pick up a book. Read through the stories and discover how worlds can unfold in your imagination. Witness how characters come to life through the words and how the stories feel as real as can be.

Perhaps you now understand how the Book Bugs came to be...